Welcome to Whittaker Creek

The Whittaker Creek Recreation Site is nestled in the Coast Range of Oregon between Eugene and the Oregon coast. Located at the confluence of Whittaker Creek and the Siuslaw River, this recreation site offers a wealth of activities including old growth forest hiking, fishing, wildlife viewing, salmon watch, picnicking and camping. Whittaker Creek campground and the surrounding area is home to large canopy trees such as Douglas fir, western hemlock, red cedar, red alder and big leaf maple. The forest understory features a host of native plants like rhododendron, salal, various fern species, salmonberry and vine maple. On the forest floor, oxalis, Calypso orchids and mosses compliment the scenery. A diverse variety of bird life, from the seldom seen pileated woodpecker, northern spotted owl, marbled murrelet to the ubiquitous Oregon junco frequent this area. Signs of larger animals, such as raccoon, mink, bear, elk, deer and beaver are evident. Whittaker Creek is part of the Siuslaw River watershed that drains water from the Coast Range to the Pacific Ocean. The creek is a designated watchable wildlife site because it provides habitat of vital importance to anadromous fish species which include coho and chinook salmon, steelhead, cutthroat trout and other fish species. Chinook and coho salmon, as well as steelhead trout can be observed in the fall and winter months spawning in the creek next to the campground.

This quiet recreation site offers family camping in a wooded riverside location with hiking trails that provides access to an old growth stand of Douglas fir high above the campground and the Siuslaw River. The Old Growth Ridge Trail was designated in 1994 as a National Recreation Trail due to the exceptional wildlife, geologic and old growth trees that are found in a strange ecosystem. In addition to nature study and relaxation, Whittaker Creek offers a summer swimming area, a picnic site, children's play area, horseshoe pits and potable water available from hand pumps in the campground.

The Whittaker Creek Recreation Site is managed by the Eugene District of the Bureau of Land Management (BLM). Much of the land that surrounds the campground and other lands within the Coast Range are managed by the BLM for sustained yield timber production, as well as watershed protection, recreation, wildlife habitat, and other renewable and non-renewable resources.
